The Geographical Imagination of Annie Proulx

The Geographical Imagination of Annie Proulx: Rethinking Regionalism, edited by Alex Hunt, analyzes Proulx from many angles: as a writer who typically foregrounds place instead of characters (what Hunt calls "the insistence of geography" in her work), who delves into New England and the West, who works in the tradition of realism yet extends beyond it, venturing into territory that Margaret E. Johnson describes as "hyperreal," and whose depiction of homosexual characters "challenges ...
